The ability of autophagic-lysosomal activity to reflect hepatic stress was examined in rats after cecal ligation and perforation (CLP). Twenty-four hours after CLP, the release of the stress-sensitive hormones corticosterone and beta-endorphin (beta-E) in the blood was clearly increased. Autophagic-lysosomal activity, as determined by the effect of methylamine on the lysosomal enzyme acid phosphatase, was depressed in the liver of these animals. However, at 4 h after CLP, when the corticosterone and beta-E values were also elevated, the ability of lysosomal enzymes to degrade N-acetyl-beta-D-glucosaminidase (NAGase) was more markedly depressed than their ability to degrade acid phosphatase. At 24 h after CLP, the activities of both enzymes were reduced to the same extent, although the NAGase activity was still depressed. These findings indicate that the autophagic-lysosomal system is more sensitive to the stress response than either the corticosterone or beta-E system. The evidence also suggests that although beta-E is released rapidly, the metabolism of lysosomal enzymes by the autophagic-lysosomal system can be initiated very early, at about 4 h after CLP. Horseshoe Valley (Washington) Horseshoe Valley is an alpine valley within the Skagit Range of the North Cascades of Washington, United States.

It is the source of Horseshoe Creek, and lies at the southern end of the Skagit Range at the center of the Horseshoe Basin. See also List of mountain ranges References Category:Valleys of Washington (state) Category:North Cascades of Washington (state) Category:Land 82157476af
